O'Connen rapped for assistance and Patrolinan rater joined him. With dark lanterns swinging the two entered the building. In the nailway on the fourth floor they found a neap of plaster, bricks and mortar and a gap.ng hole in the wall. Hammers and chiese were strewn about.

An investigation disclosed the rare ingenuity of the burgiars. The point in the punding at No. 100 where they did their tunnelling was at exactly the right spot to gain the fourth floor of that per company's place. Pencil markings and ingrains showed that the scientific burgiars had done some rough calculating before beginning their operations. To denden the sound of their work they had wrapped thoir tools with towels. It is believed that it took them at least two hours to break their way through the stout brick wall of the building.
